Warning!

Brewing your own beer is a rewarding hobby, but is not without risks. There are many dangerous elements involved in the home brewing process, including but not limited to: open flames/fire, boiling/scalding hot liquids, flammable gas, combustion by-products, scalding hot equipment surfaces, electricity, hazardous chemicals, and more. Even water by itself can pose a hazard in certain circumstances.

It is up to you, the brewer, to determine the appropriate level of safety and caution to exercise when brewing. Using brewstands.com brewing equipment is no exception (see warranty information). You must be cautious and aware of safety hazards, including those posed by using brewstands.com home brewing equipment. It is up to you, the brewer, to determine what safety gear should be used, and what safety precautions should be practiced in the course of the brew day, and even while your brewing equipment is sitting idle.

Failure to implement proper safety precautions may result in temporary or even PERMANENT injuries or damages, including, but not limited to: structural damage, scrapes, cuts, burns, scalds, electrocution, cardiac arrest, suffocation, sprains, broken bones, or even death. The brewer also needs to be aware that these injuries may not affect the brewer themselves, but any person or property that may be in the area. If you are unable to exercise absolute caution while brewing, and are unwilling to accept all risks involved in the home brewing process, you should stop brewing immediately. Furthermore, should you ever suspect that the equipment you are using may not be suitable for safe brewing practice, cease using the questionable equipment immediately.

Brewstands.com recommends never brewing around children, pets, or persons that may be incapable of making the same decisions that the brewer must make regarding safety issues. Brewing may involve large, heavy vessels of liquid (normally very hot – but even empty, cool vessels can cause injuries), and in the case of brewstands.com home brew systems, they are often at elevated levels. NEVER STAND; NOR ALLOW CHILDREN, PETS, OR OTHER PERSONS TO STAND NEAR OR UNDER YOUR HOME BREW SYSTEM WHETHER IN USE OR WHILE STORED.

Use of Brewstands.com equipment acknowledges that you understand the above, and that you take full responsibility for any damages incurred. If your Brewstands.com brewing equipment is passed to another user, it is your responsibility to pass on this advisory to the new user.
